

Masthead Logo

The Iowa Review

Volume 25
Issue 1 Winter

Article 10

1995

Matins

William Aiken

Follow this and additional works at: <https://ir.uiowa.edu/iowareview>

Part of the Creative Writing Commons

Recommended Citation

Aiken, William. "Matins." The Iowa Review 25.1 (1995): 57-58. Web.
Available at: <https://doi.org/10.17077/0021-065X.4385>

This Contents is brought to you for free and open access by Iowa Research Online. It has been accepted for inclusion in The Iowa Review by an authorized administrator of Iowa Research Online. For more information, please contact lib-ir@uiowa.edu.

Matins · William Aiken

All my dog needs
is enough light
to make out certain messages

equivalent to the wind needed
to blow the classifieds
under a tree.

There is a scale of illumination that tells a car that has been abandoned
from one merely parked in front of a new friend's house,

a man planting shrubs in the night
from the flowering shrub itself,
Venus at 20 degrees in the east, caught in the telephone lines.

I am out with my dog to ascertain the sequence of birds
in the morning—

three whistles at 7:06, a warbler,
by 7:10 sparrow and chickadee chirps,
and then the crow at 7:26, just as the sun rises.

Today a seven-year-old will have her first trumpet lesson,
a high school band will pack for a football game,
a mother will make her first visit to the therapist.

Does the swelling chorus equal the swelling light?
My dog stops at the split rail fence
near wasted virgin's bower

the sickly fragrance gone,
only the dazzling tendrils left.
We indulge each other's pauses,

swept by a scent or a memory.
Coming back from the Animal Rescue shelter,
I took her, she took me.

Already dogwood has turned its green-veined russet.
The lindens yellow.
Magnolias begin their desperate continuance.

My dog and I conclude
a bird's chirp is not equal to one lumen.
This is the scale of our lives, these early things.

We have lived as each other's motive for many years.